Surrendering "If Only..."

I sometimes find myself obsessed with "if only." If only I had made different choices, if only those around me acted differently, if only the world worked differently. Upon reflection, I am able to see how this obsession made things much more difficult than they had to be.

When I think of things in terms of "if only," I forget that my Higher Power has a role in all of this as well. I am getting better at knowing myself and what I want and need. But at the end of the day, it is all subject to my Higher Power's will. This only becomes a bad thing when I obsess about how I think things should be instead. Regardless, I must still be gentle with myself.

My obsession with "if only" has a lot to do with the daydreaming I would do growing up. I would spend a lot of time thinking about alternate realities and how things might be better "if only." But now I realize it was quite possibly the only way I knew how to process any difficult feelings I had about my situation or circumstances. Today, I am so grateful to have awareness of what is going on when I do this and the ability to do something different when I catch it.

Judging Myself

Before recovery, I never really thought of myself as a judgmental person. I did my best to embrace caring about others, even those very different from myself, but it was mostly superficial. I had reasons for my prejudices, experiences in some cases, but it was mostly what I was taught by family and the culture that surrounded me.

In Al-Anon, after taking the third step, I was becoming aware that my Higher Power had opened me toward revealing myself as fully as possible. I heard the phrase, "We are only as sick as our secrets." That resonated with me, as I had grown up with lies and secrecy and had squirmed under the nameless weight of it. I wanted to be healthy, well, and dwell with the Spirit within as I was coming to embrace its power in my life.

In taking my fourth step, I gave deeper thoughts to and began to examine my prejudices for truth. Before I could address my judgment of others, I had to look at myself differently, and essentially, stop judging myself for judging others. I had begun to recognize myself as a worthy, loving person, abandoning fear for love, detached from any outcome, reliant on my Higher Power. I could change my heart toward myself in this way, and I could change my heart and mind about others.

First Things First

One of the benefits of working my program is the slogan, "First Things First." Along with this slogan is the thought of doing the next right thing in whatever situation I find myself. I find that my emotions are settled and I am peaceful as I attend to the next right thing that I encounter. I stay present with what is going on at this moment rather than obsess and worry about something that only the future holds and that my Higher Power is yet to reveal to me.

A friend once told me, "Be where your feet are." It was helpful in stopping myself from future tripping and living in some even regret of my past failings. It is something I am working on daily, and though I often fail, I have gained more moments of serenity than ever before as I practice.

By putting first things first as they are revealed to me, I revel in the mystery and awe of discovery. I don't have to know what will happen next or be overly attached to outcomes. I can enjoy the process and watch life unfold, acting when I am called upon, doing my best and being willing to fail and get up again when I do. When I don't do this, and get caught in obsession and unhealthy attachment, I miss this moment.

In recovery, I discovered that there was much of life that I missed out on because of worry and regret. My commitment to my recovery means that I approach each moment differently than I did before, treating each moment and every encounter as a gift and an opportunity for change. First Things First helps me to make the most of each moment and create a new, healthier life for myself.
